Freedom

By J.K. Currie

In 500 BC a young member of the Krypteia kills his first Helot; on Mt Ithome in 461 two Spartan prisoners plot their escape from their Helot captors; in 456 the poet Pindar learns from the man's widow what happened to one of his Olympic victors during a democratic revolution in the colony of Kyrene; on the island of Melos in 415 two children of Athenian settlers learn what happened to the original islanders; in 399 Socrates asks Plato if it as a tragic playwright that he wishes to be remembered; in 374 an Athenian diplomat to Persia is given a Spartan slave to attend him – his dilemma – should he try to free a fellow Greek? Or should he rejoice at the humiliation of an enemy? In 373 a Spartan soldier is torn between helping a Helot recruit to escape and obeying the orders of the governing Ephors.

First published in 1929, this little volume has stood the test of time. A collection of thirteen short stories set over a 100 year period during the great age of the Greek city-states, Mitchison demonstrates her genuine knowledge and empathy for what it might have meant to be an ordinary Greek man or woman or child in the events of those years. The stories are fascinating and intricate and arouse real sympathy for the protagonists. There is some superb characterisation. I especially enjoyed the story entitled 'The Epiphany of Poieessa' which is a kind of postscript to Mitchison's long novel of the Peloponnesian War 'Cloudeuckooland'. Freedom, its limitations and restrictions are themes which are examined and re-examined in the contexts of each of the stories. The reader is left with a genuine feeling that this is how it might have been.

I have only two caveats for the potential reader of this collection. It demands quite a lot of knowledge of Fifth Century Greek history, religion and society. It also includes a number of the author's own poems, which are a bit hit and miss in quality. Other than that, I cannot recommend these stories highly enough.
